Abstract: This paper investigates the relationship between international trade and income, exploiting a dynamic distance measure generated by the growth of container ships and Panama Canal capacity. Employing a version of the gravity model, this paper constructs an instrument for trade that accounts for bilateral trade flow differences driven by the Panama Canal and big ships. I exploit the created instrument, given its purely geography-based nature, to estimate the impact of trade on income between 2002 and 2022. This paper finds a trade elasticity of income at 0.4, indicating that a one-dollar increase in trade translates into a 40-cent higher income on average. Compared to earlier studies, this indicates a more pronounced impact of trade on income in the recent era of globalization.

WORKING PAPERS

The Role of Energy Efficiency in Productivity: Evidence from Canada (Job Market Paper)

Abstract: This paper quantifies how the misallocation of energy, capital, and labor across provinces and sectors reduces productivity in Canada. Using annual provincial input–output data (2014–2020) and a standard Hsieh–Klenow–style framework, I decompose the loss into interprovincial (within-sector) and intersectoral (within-province) components and measure each input’s contribution. Unlike most studies focusing on firm-level variation within manufacturing, I examine the full economy at the province–sector level. The results show that misallocation drags aggregate productivity 5–8% below its efficient potential, depending on the assumed substitutability of goods between provinces. Within-sector misallocation drives most of the loss, reaching 4.3%, while between-sector misallocation contributes up to 4%, consistently less than the within-sector component, indicating interprovincial misallocation is the primary source. While energy accounts for only 8% of input costs, it makes up as much as 1.5% of the gap—comparable to capital’s 1.8% peak and substantially exceeding that of labor’s 0.8%—highlighting energy’s key role in productivity.

Uneven Gains: The Environmental Justice Impact of the Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative (RGGI) on Local Air Pollution and Health. (with Sookti Chaudhary and Linh Pham)

Abstract: This paper examines how cap-and-trade programs on greenhouse gases such as CO2, CH4, and N2O—specifically, the Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative (RGGI)—indirectly affect local air pollutants such as NOx and SOX through their impact on power plants. By investigating differences in emission reductions across various locations, we assess the environmental justice effects of these programs. We use a difference-in-differences (DiD) method with heterogeneous treatment effects, preserving the asymmetry of how the program affects each power plant. Then, we feed these changes into a high-resolution intervention air pollution model (InMAP) to analyze how pollution reduction impacts vary among different demographic groups across fine-grained areas (1 km x 1 km census tracts). We focus on the RGGI program, launched in 2009 and tightened in 2014 across 9 northeastern U.S. states. We find significant variation in how the program affects emissions across power plants, leading to uneven health benefits, with avoided deaths varying by region.
